Notes:

Latex paint I would professionally warn against, because of price increase and length of time. Paint will not offer the protection that the products listed above will offer. Paint tends to peel overtime without proper maintenance such as power-washing as well. Also, you would need to: oil prime it first, then apply the latex paint on deck plus a sealer protection afterwards. You will also possibly lose the natural wood grain finish based on the effect you are looking for. Roughly, the paint would cost the same as the stain for deck and picnic table. However, because of the extra steps involved in that process, labor would be an extra $1000.00, bringing you to a total of $4050.50, if you intend to go that route. It just doesn't seem to be worth it in my professional opinion.
